FOREWORD TO THE DANISH SECTION

BY SIGURD SCHULTZ

Denmark is by nature a land without great contrasts. The Danish landscape is unimposing and unpretentious, but it has a quiet beauty of exquisite nuances. It is a flat country, where knolls and little hills alternate with woods, meadows and quiet streams. It can be sombre and in places almost savage, but for the most part it is a country of smiling green pastures and golden cornfields, and its characteristic quality is a winning charm and a gentle rhythm. Denmark is an island kingdom, surrounded by open beaches, and the ocean and the roar of the waves are deep ingrained in the subconscious psychology of every Dane. Heavy clouds drive across the heavens that are vaulted over this lovely land.

Quiet and unpretentious, too, are the people who inhabit this island kingdom. The strong contrasts that are to be found in the social classes of the larger countries, the contrasts between the enormously wealthy and the hopelessly poor, are unknown to Denmark. The great majority of the population are in comfortable economic circumstances, and the differences in wealth or in class are nowhere so great but that everyone can feel himself on a level with his neighbour. In Denmark, indeed, it can be asserted, with a considerable degree of truth, that all men are equal not only in theory but in actuality. This economic and social equality gives an extraordinary uniformity to Danish culture, and envelopes a common social outlook which has assured a peaceful, harmonious development, a high cultural standard and a healthy growth of intellectual as well as of material interests.

The Exhibition of Danish Arts and Crafts which is now visiting Canada may be considered a valid expression of the Danish genius, of the sum of knowledge and achievement which is the common property of the Danish people. For centuries land and people have acted and interacted upon each other and have developed a Danish character adequately and worthily represented in its art. This art in its present form, or let us say in its present character, has remained relatively unchanged for a century and a half. Of course the outward appearance has changed with the shifting styles, but the spirit in which the arts and crafts have been conceived has remained unchanged. The dream of a great classical ideal, which inspired Bertel Thorvaldsen to create his masterpieces in Rome a century ago, still inspires Danish artists to-day; just as the feeling of communion with all life and all things, the enthusiasm for the homely joys of daily life and the profound wisdom of simple truths, which made Hans Christian Andersen Denmark's greatest writer, still animate the soul of present day Denmark.

The Danish spirit is sensitive to and alert for the finer naunces, the delicate shadings, and it is repelled by violent effects which offend its sense of proportion. It is, rather, the fine rhythms, the delicate transitions that move it deeply, and where it comes in contact with genuine naturalness and upright sincerity, it welcomes them with a glad confidence. If you are to understand Denmark and the Danish spirit, you must be able to appreciate the subtler, more intimate values. They are not such as reveal themselves to the hurried, casual glance. One must immerse oneself in them, put oneself in a receptive mood, and not until then do they become real and precious.

A people of this nature, it is scarcely necessary to remark, does not create art that glitters in pomp and splendour. The spring-wheel of the Danish arts and crafts has been the love of the Danes for their homes. This attachment to the home is a well-nigh universal sentiment, and from highest to lowest you find the same eagerness to adorn it with lovely things. This is the cultural ideal that has inspired and impelled Danish arts and crafts, for the main current of the Danish creative genius has been directed to the adornment of the burgher home and its artistic ennoblement; to fulfill the aesthetic demands of a well-to-do people for a domestic environment wherein the spirit might repose.

THE NATIONAL SOCIETY OF MURAL PAINTERS

(UNITED STATES)

FOREWORD

The work of the mural painter has this in common with the work of the architect, that the essentials of the theme, that is, the movement of the masses, the general tonality, the scale of the component parts, the relative prominence of the various details and the rhythm of the pattern employed, must be studied at a small scale in order to insure adequacy at the full scale.

True mural painting is so intimate and inseparable a part of the architecture that it adorns, that any attempt to show examples of it in an exhibition separate from the settings for which they were designed, must prove relatively inadequate and disappointing, but, on the other hand, the increasing appreciation of this branch of art in this country has brought with it an increasing interest in the processes by means of which the final results are attained.

The present exhibition has been assembled by the National Society of Mural Painters under the auspices of the American Federation of Arts, with the purpose of contributing to general knowledge on the subject, rather than as an attempt to convey any adequate idea of the qualities and characteristics of the work of the various artists represented.

ON THE MEDIUMS OF ETCHING

There are five principal ways of making a Print.

In Drypoint, the design is scratched or cut into the polished surface of a metal plate with a sharp steel or diamond point; this point makes not only a groove, but raises a furrow or "burr", which gives a shaded line in the Print.

In Mezzotint, the design is scraped out from a plate that has been previously chiseled with a many-toothed tool, giving it a spongy surface, which would print uniform black, but which gives lighter tones, the deeper the design has been scraped away.

In Etching proper, the plate is first covered with wax, the design then scratched through the wax with a sharp point, leaving the metal bare in the lines; when acid is applied, these lines are bitten into grooves in the plate; deeper lines are made by covering some lines with wax and re-biting.

In Aquatint, the plate is covered with powdered resin, which, melted, forms a delicate mesh of metal between globules of resin; here the acid bites; tones are made by covering parts with wax and re-biting.

In Soft Ground, the plate is covered with mixed wax and tallow, a sheet of rough paper laid thereon, and the design drawn firmly on the paper, which takes up the covering where pressed, leaving imperfect lines of bare metal, along which the acid then bites. These lines print soft like charcoal lines.

In all cases, the plate is cleansed of wax, rubbed with ink, judiciously wiped more or less clean, a sheet of damp paper laid thereon, and is passed between the rollers of the press, under many tons pressure, which forces the paper to take up the ink, giving the print itself. Inks of many colours may be used, but each Print is separately inked.
